[\[1\]](#) Translator's note: In conformity with common usage at the time, the term "Moldavia" and "Moldavian" are used to differentiate the territory and population residing in the Moldavian SSR from the northeastern province of Moldova in Romania and the population residing there. However, the Romanian language as used both in Romania proper and in Moldavia (the current Republic of Moldova) employs the same term ("Moldova") for both. Before the Russian empire extended into the region in the 18th century the term "Moldova" referred to one territorial unit that included both Romanian Moldova and most of the territory that eventually comprised the Moldavian SSR (as well as the Bugeac/Budjak region now in Ukraine). After 1989 the US State Department Geographer officially designated the English variant of the new independent state as the Republic of Moldova while referring to the Romanian province as "Moldavia" for purposes of differentiation, thus reversing previous practice. The terms "Moldavia" and "Moldavian" are employed here in conformity with common American usage at that time.
